The Historical Context of the Oxford English Dictionary

The Oxford English Dictionary, now regarded as the definitive record of the English language, began as an ambitious project in the mid-19th century. The desire for a comprehensive dictionary arose from a need to document the evolution and breadth of English words and their meanings. This section outlines the socio-cultural and academic environment that necessitated the creation of such a monumental work.

The Genesis of the OED Project

The idea to create a historical dictionary of English was proposed by the Philological Society of London in 1857. Prior dictionaries were considered insufficient in their scope and detail. The OED aimed to provide detailed etymologies, quotations, and historical usage for every English word. This massive undertaking required extensive coordination, research, and public involvement.

Challenges in 19th Century Lexicography

Lexicography during the 19th century faced numerous difficulties, including the sheer volume of words, the need for accurate historical citations, and limited technological resources. The project relied heavily on volunteer readers who submitted quotations from printed works. These challenges set the stage for the unique collaboration detailed in Winchester's narrative.
