Confucian Ideals and Women's Roles

For centuries, Chinese society has been heavily influenced by Confucianism, which emphasizes hierarchical relationships and the importance of family. In this framework, women were often relegated to subordinate roles, primarily responsible for domestic duties and child-rearing. Confucian virtues such as chastity, obedience, and loyalty were expected of women, leading to the notion of the "three obediences":

1. Obedience to their fathers in youth

Despite these restrictive norms, many women found ways to assert themselves and contribute to society.
