Historical Background of the Occupation of Alcatraz Island

The occupation of Alcatraz Island began on November 20, 1969, when a group of Native American activists, primarily from the group Indians of All Tribes (IAT), took control of the former federal prison located in San Francisco Bay. The occupiers claimed the island by right of discovery, invoking the Treaty of Fort Laramie (1868), which stated that all abandoned federal land should revert to Native peoples. The island had been closed as a penitentiary in 1963 and was unused by the federal government, making it a compelling symbol for Native American reclamation.
