Social Structure of Ancient Egypt

The social hierarchy of ancient Egypt was well-defined and played a crucial role in shaping daily life. At the top of this hierarchy was the Pharaoh, considered both a political leader and a divine figure. Below the Pharaoh were several key groups:

- Nobility: This class included high-ranking officials, priests, and military leaders who held substantial power and wealth.

The economy of ancient Egypt was primarily agrarian, relying heavily on the Nile River's annual flooding, which enriched the soil and allowed for productive farming. The main crops included wheat, barley, flax, and various fruits and vegetables.

Agricultural Practices

The agricultural calendar revolved around the Nile's inundation. The following seasons defined the agricultural cycle:

1. Akhet (Inundation): Occurring from June to September, this season involved the flooding of the Nile, which deposited nutrient-rich silt on the land.
